128. They may impose a fine of one dollar on any person who may discharge a gun or other firearms in the said town on any day except on days when the militia may be mustered or paraded therein; and the like fine upon all persons who may suffer their chimneys or any of them to flame out; or upon any person driving, training or riding any horse at an immoderate gait through the streets.

129. They may impose reasonable fines on all persons permitting their swine, goats, or geese to run at large in said town.

130. They may establish and regulate fire wards and fire companies in said town, and enact all such ordinances as they deem necessary for the prevention and extinguishment of fire, and to compel property holders in said town to furnish themselves with fire buckets.

131. They may levy annually upon the taxable property of said town, at the same time as other taxes, a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars to be expended under their direction in keeping the engine and hose, and other apparatus attached thereto, in good repair.

132. They may provide by ordinance for taking up, fining or committing to the work-house in said town all vagrant, loose and disorderly persons, lewd women, keepers of bawdy houses, and persons having no visible means of support, and common disturbers of a neighborhood, that may be found within the limits of the town, and to make it the duty of the keeper or overseer of said work-house to receive and safe keep all persons who shall be committed according to the tenor of such commitment; but no fine imposed under this section shall exceed the sum of twenty dollars, nor shall any person be committed to said work-house for a longer time than thirty days for any one offence.

133. They may appoint a wood corder or wood corders and a weigher of hay, and allow to each such compensation as they may deem reasonable.

134. They may lay and collect such tax as they may think proper upon all players and showmen exhibiting within the town.
